The Canadian Journal of Psychiatry provides a vehicle for researchers working in psychiatry and mental health to communicate original research findings to 4300 researchers, psychiatrist clinicians, and targeted family physicians with a demonstrated interest in mental health practice.

Each issue, the Journal publishes the popular In Review series of papers by world leaders in psychiatry on a broad range of biopsychosocial topics such as the following planned for 2004:

- telepsychiatry
- Canadian study on health and aging
- neuropsychiatry
- palliative care
- psychopharmacology
- psychotherapy training
- special geriatric issue (no In Review articles)
- gambling
- community treatment orders
- social phobia
- somatization disorder
- depression

In addition to the In Review series, the Journal publishes seven original research and review papers each issue as well as book reviews and letters to the editor.

As the official scientific publication of the Canadian Psychiatric Association, the Journal also publishes official position papers, guidelines, brief statements, and clinical practice guidelines. Supplements to the Journal examine current research and topics of special interest.

Established in 1956, The Canadian Journal of Psychiatry has been keeping psychiatrists and health professionals current about the newest developments in the field for more than 40 years.

PMB 2003 results reinforce findings from an independently funded survey by Delta Media Vision Research that the more patients psychiatrists see, the more likely they are to read The Canadian Journal of Psychiatry as most relevant to their clinical practice and continuing professional development needs.

For information about psychiatry and mental health in Canada, The Canadian Journal of Psychiatry is the obvious and proven readers’ choice.
